Ministers, high-level representatives from the business sector and top UN and multilateral agency officials are gathering in Abu Dhabi for the first time after the UN Climate Change Conference in Paris in December to discuss the implications of the historic Paris Agreement. On 16-17 January, government officials from over 150 countries and representatives from the private sector, civil society and international organizations will convene for the 6th assembly of the International Renewable Energy Agency (IRENA). This year's Assembly will focus on the critical role of renewable energy in combating climate change and meeting other Sustainable Development Goals. IRENA analysis shows that scaling up deployment to achieve a 36 per cent share of renewable energy in the global energy mix by 2030 can provide roughly half of the emissions reductions needed to keep the global temperature rise below 2 degrees Celsius, while energy efficiency can provide the rest. The IRENA Assembly is part of the Abu Dhabi Sustainability Week (running to 23 January), which is one of the world's largest annual gatherings in sustainability and renewable energy.
